Community Health Centers Prepare For Federal Help

Some advocates in Michigan are promoting the benefits that the federal healthcare reform law will have on community health centers. Community health centers are facilities that provide a wide variety of health services all under one roof, regardless of a patient's insurance status or ability to pay. Dana Hughes, with the Michigan Primary Care Association, says that the state's 31 community health centers will get substantial funding under the healthcare reform law, meaning long-term benefits for the public health:

Listen:

More than one billion dollars is going to centers nationwide this fall so they can expand facilities and staff to help meet primary care needs as more people enter the health system under federal reform.
